If you are located in United States. This invention relates to an improved weatherstrip for a door of a motor vehicle, and more particularly to such a weatherstrip that is capable of providing high resistance to joint movement between an outer door panel and a vehicle body and to noise produced by movement between the door and the body. A conventional door weatherstrip is generally defined by a base portion and a lip portion. Usually, the base portion is continuous in a longitudinal direction and joins the lip portion. The base portion extends in a lateral direction from the juncture with the lip portion along the vehicle body. A transversely extending end portion extends perpendicularly from the end of the base portion. As the door is opened and closed, these portions move relative to one another, thereby producing noise. A type of conventional door weatherstrip known in the art has an improved structure. The base portion is continuously connected to the lip portion and extends in the lateral direction from the juncture with the lip portion along the vehicle body. The transversely extending end portion extends perpendicularly from the end of the base portion and is spaced from the base portion along the lateral direction. A connection portion is formed in the end of the base portion and extends integrally in the lateral direction from the base portion. An end portion of the lip portion extends from the end of the base portion and is joined to the end portion of the connection portion. This arrangement facilitates the movement of the lip portion relative to the base portion along the vehicle body, thereby reducing the noise which is generated. As a result, the weatherstrip is less noisy to other noises to which the motor vehicle is subjected. However, the conventional type of weatherstrip as described above suffers from a disadvantage that the base portion is connected to the end portion of the lip portion only with the end portion of the base portion f678ca9f9e
